The overall average cost to the Arthritis Foundation for the ja conference is $2,700 per family or $650. What is special about the Ja Conference? Many former participants noted that when their child was first diagnosed—regardless of whether they live in a busy subway or a small town—the overwhelming feeling was that they were all alone. The Ja Conference aims to resolve this sentiment, and provides an opportunity to meet other families facing similar challenges, share stories, learn more about the latest treatments and expert research, discover strategies to manage daily activities, educational rights and support for developmental and social issues. Throughout the weekend, children, teens and siblings participate in their own educational and social programs throughout the weekend. They learn about their illness, advocacy, fundraising, how to tell their stories and fun activities where children can just be children. Young adults, aged 18 to 30, also have their own tailored educational and social programming. These topics include the transition from pediatrics to adult care, solutions for university and entry into the workforce, and how to defend effectively for yourself. While your child or children participate in their own sessions, parents and caregivers also participate in their own programs. Adults can set their own calendar of topics such as: networking opportunities other moms, dads and caregivers, general sessions with keynote speakers, break-in sessions that include disease-specific education, educational rights and fundraising. Who is the Conference? The JA Conference is for the whole family! Whether you are a child with JA or a sibling of a child with JA, you are welcome to attend the conference. Parents - whether you work as a couple or as a single-parent family - are always welcome. We have had grandparents, aunts and uncles who are secondary caregivers, because we are that JA affects the whole family. And it's for everyone affected by juvenile arthritis. You see, ja is a general term that refers to many types of arthritis and rheumatic diseases that affect children. Related conditions include uveitis, spondyloarthropathy, ankylosing spondylitis, irritable bowel syndrome, Lyme arthritis, immune system diseases and many more. It's just a brief way to describe the many diagnoses our families have to deal with. Special programming for all ages and roles Whether you are a child or a young adult with arthritis or you are the brother or sister of someone with the disease, you will benefit from special programming at the Ja Conference. Infants and toddlers: Younger children (aged 0-4) are cared for in a stimulating environment enriched by childcare experts. Children: In a child-friendly atmosphere, children enter groups in K-4th class (5 years and older). Led by experts, these sessions are designed for fun and play, but children also learn how to manage their arthritis. Middle and High School: Middle and secondary school programs are offered to teens in grades 6 to 12, supervised by a team of highly experienced program activity managers. All activities are designed to help teens overcome barriers, recognize and accept differences in themselves and others, and build and maintain meaningful friendships that can last a lifetime. Young Adults: Tailor-made for 18 to 30-year-olds, the young adult program includes workshops on real issues, dating relationships, particularly college and employment. Parents and caregivers: Moms and fathers learn and discuss the latest medications, parenting advice, educational rights, social and developmental issues, and how to advocate for greater research and access to pediatric rheumatologists. Siblings: Siblings are encouraged to participate in the fun and share how JA has affected their lives. By Louise Balle There are so many different types of forms that you can sell online to make people's lives easier. If you have a law training, or just a knack for creating standard forms, you can start a nice online business selling them to consumers you never even have to meet. Many people search the Internet for standard forms to download such as rental and expulsion forms, examples of contracts that can be customized, supplier forms and application forms that can be integrated into a business. Create forms in a standard word processing program like Microsoft Word. The form should be easy to change as you may need to make changes to the forms you will be offering online later. Convert your forms to PDF format. If they're filling out forms, use Adobe Acrobat to create form fields in the document that can easily be filled out online and printed by the user (see Resources for more information on creating fillable forms in Acrobat). Zip your files to deliver to customers online (optional if you sell only one form per transaction). If you wish, add a password to each zip file as an additional layer of and have the password automatically sent to the person ordering the form. Open a PayPal to accept online payments instantly. You can also contact a credit card merchant service provider to get your own personalized merchant number. Also open a PayPal as it fits well with the services you may need to make transactions. Establish a simple website to view and sell your forms (see Resources for a site, for example). Buy a hosting plan that allows you enough bandwidth to accommodate all the forms that will be downloaded from the site. Create a simple homepage that gives information about your small business and a clear list of all forms available for download. Create an information and descriptive page for each form. Write each page with SEO, or search engine optimization, in mind (see Resources for basic SEO concepts). Sign up for an account with Payloadz.com. This site offers convenient cost-effective file delivery services. When you use Payloadz, a single activation key will be generated for each customer and the IP address will be recorded to ensure that no one except the buyer can download the information from the site. This is the best option if you are concerned that your forms will be shared. Clickbank.com also offers a similar paid service. November 9, 2010 5 min read The opinions expressed by entrepreneurial contributors are theirs. Selling online is a great way for your small businesses to boost sales - provided you don't poison the relationship with all the steps and challenges the requirements of your site from potential customers. It sounds simple, but if an address form is too complex, a customer's online question is not answered or the ordering process is too complex, you can lose customers before you even have them. In the past, there was only one way to smooth out this always critical path to web sales: Hire an expensive computer coder, collect as much data as you could on using your site and pay dearly for the great fat buckets of upgrades you needed from them. Formstack, based in Indianapolis, Ind., aims to change that by removing the coding intermediary. The company's internet form tool tries to make it quick, easy and inexpensive for your business to create your own online forms, register customers, organize a contest or even sell goods - all in a way you can control. Interest in Formstack, which is free to begin with, but which will be about $30 per month for most is naturally high. The basic, free version has more than 100,000 users; Paid versions with more capacity and flexibility have nearly 10,000 users. What we've been trying to build here is a solution to a business problem: How can I provide an answer to the user a question? says Chris Byers, CEO of Formstack. What to Love Compared to Paying a Coder, Formstack is a serious business. Formstack gives you a lot for your money. The free version allows me to create three forms, each with up to 10 fields and 50 registered entries. It's great for a small club, club, a legitimate company probably needs a pony for a paid version. The cheapest option, at $14 per month, is all it takes to run a simple e-newsletter. The most expensive, at $160 per month, allows you to operate a good sized online store, run a complex contest with hundreds of entries or collect massive amounts of data about the people who visit your website. My choice is the $30-a-month version, which includes 20 forms - each with up to 200 fields and 2,000 saved entries - with five style models, five users and 1 gigabyte of storage. All this for the price of about 90 minutes of a coder's time. Your time is another problem, but still, it's a market. Formstack's surprising power and flexibility make complex web form development relatively accessible. All the basic information that an average company would like is here: You can collect data, host a local event, administer event registrations, or get customers to sign up for newsletter or coupon, among many other functions. You can work from existing forms or develop your own. And Formstack has good security, a nice iPhone application and fits well with Salesforce.com, MailChimp, Highrise, Google Apps and most blogging platforms. Answers, incoming data and other information are available in real time, and most importantly, you can change as you learn what sells and what doesn't. You can test the price drop, try a tie-in or promotion, or even offer incentives literally as you dream them. What's not to like It's not as easy as it sounds Formstack might be a good option for a company that wants to simply interact with customers. But to achieve real profits, it will take a real investment of time and resources. You enter the delicate world of web sales logic. Be warned that while Formstack is an excellent source of data on your customers, interpreting this data is a minefield of trial and error that takes a long time. The $360 a year that most businesses will pay for the tool could easily be wasted unless your company commits to making your website work really with the information you get. It competes with the big ones - and doesn't always win Formstack does so much that it inadvertently goes toe-to-toe with sophisticated products. And many of these products, especially those that specialize in a single service, are superior. Formstack's survey tool, which often requires you to write down your own questions, is far less than a dedicated product like that helps you ask the right questions, get the answers you want, manage the answers and otherwise get a real return on the information. Bottom Line Formstack deserves credit for bringing powerful coding to the shapes-creating masses. If your small business has a web presence - whether it's an e-commerce game or a lead qualification tool - you should definitely have a look. But before you sign up, make sure you have time to make it work for you and check the market for dedicated, market-based tools that meet your specific, individual online Needs. If you find them, they will probably work better than this unique product. As is so often the case online, do-it-yourself web development is not as simple as Formstack would like you to believe. Believe.
